Better To Die Than Be Without Society

Do we need the external society in order to execute internal work?

A person is not able to do internal work alone, on his own, without having a connection with society. It is impossible to perform inner work without him building an appropriate, external environment. Each one of us has to be connected to others, otherwise it is impossible to direct anything towards a spiritual goal. It's better to die than be without a society. A person who tries alone to advance will go the long way, the regular way of suffering, and not the faster way of "before time."

The article, "Freedom," explains it very nicely. In the end, the path of suffering also leads to the path of before the time, the faster way, and commits one to realize his free choice, which is the choice of the appropriate environment.
